

Abstract

The paper discusses the origin and development of Indian languages in general and points out the logical problems in the historical comparative method for establishing linguistic geneology in particular. The paper also argues for including the linguistic typology in the frame of things and highlights the advantages of the concept of a common linguistic area for Indian languages.